Battery Metals: Liontown plans extra drilling to find the edges of the hefty (and growing) Kathleen Valley deposit

It's been a crazy run for advanced hard rock explorer Liontown Resources (ASX:LTR), a stock which has consistently flipped the bird at weak lithium market sentiment to be up 400 per cent over the past 12 months.

Liontown's flagship Kathleen Valley project in WA boasts a current resource estimate of 74.9 million tonnes, which already makes it the 5th biggest deposit in Australia.

Results from current drilling will underpin a major resource upgrade next year that will, in turn, form the basis of a 2020 DFS, Liontown managing director David Richards says.

“We now know that additional drilling will be required over and above the current 15,000m drilling program to fully delineate the potential of this high-quality lithium-tantalum resource,” he says.

“In the meantime, shareholders can look forward to the results of a PFS, including a maiden ore reserve, later this quarter.”
